Artist and sculptor Tapan Moharana reimagines the Rabana Chhaya tradition of shadow puppetry, which is native to Odisha, as a complex narrative of ecology and displacement. Moharana uses leather puppets, clay objects and paper silhouettes to create a stunning visual performance in light and shadow. He also comments on the mythological traditions that shadow puppetry is associated with, and questions how—and whether—those mythologies impact the way we view our own social and political experiences in the present day.
